Whether you need to turn boring images into truly amazing illustrations, you're looking at logos for your business or creative enterprise, or you're thinking about postcard designs, web apps, cartoons, or other illustrations for your business, Photoshop is a tool to have in your design arsenal. The benefits of the native CPU APIs are that they are more performant than their legacy counterparts, and they also work much better in concert with GPU-accelerated effects in the Substance line. With that in mind, teams across Substance, Photoshop, and After Effects have been working on the new native GPU APIs for the past few years. Now that these APIs have been more fully implemented, we're able to once again offer layer masks with transform-based masks, and we're able to offer high-quality, GPU-accelerated dynamic filters that automatically adapt to the image content around the filter. To use these new features, the only thing you need is a recent version of Photoshop, Photoshop Elements, or Elements on macOS or Windows, or Photoshop CC 2018 on macOS, and Photoshop CC 2019 on Windows. For those of you not all that familiar with this story, let's walk through a recap to get yourself up to speed. In 2019, Adobe released a new implementation of GPU-accelerated support for compositing layers together. This was intended to be a temporary implementation for a short period of time, but the new relationship between GPU-accelerated compositing and native GPU APIs has turned out to be lasting and powerful, allowing us to move the entire layer system into this new native GPU-powered environment. And as part of this transition, we had to retire the existing legacy APIs for GPU compositing. Our attention then shifted to demonstrating how to best port layers using the native APIs.
