The numbers below show the impact of the update in Lightroom 5. They do not contain statistics on import/export times, and other criteria. I used dng profile shot in camera mode (there are other JPEG+DNG import modes as well) in raw mode, and imported photos to Lightroom 5. Because of the comparison, I cannot count as many images as I usually do. I wonder what effect the new release will have on those people who were using Lightroom 4 and Lightroom 5 simultaneously. It's been a while since the latest update, so only a few months have passed, and a few percent of the customer base should have upgraded. Photo projects will not be significantly slowed by the new release, and most people will probably spend a few hours describing why they kept waiting. However, many customers may need to upgrade because they want to keep using Lightroom 4 for all the other operations. I will try to clarify this in the next section. Let's now go over some of the new features that were present in Photoshop 7.0 and that have made their way into Photoshop CS6. ...
