The market cap of all cryptocurrencies is approaching $200 billion, nearly double what it was in mid-December 2017. Investors who put their money into bitcoin and other digital currencies are starting to wonder how this could possibly go on for much longer, while bitcoin itself continues to generate excitement as it nears a milestone in its history. Just this week, bitcoin has seen another milestone, with the closing of the $20,000 mark for the first time. The most valuable currency in the world is also rapidly approaching its first annual inflation rate. For the first time in more than 10 years, the amount of money in circulation will be less than the amount of bitcoin that is in circulation. How can a currency get more valuable? The average inflation rate for a currency is usually calculated as a percentage of the total amount of money in circulation and the average rate in the United States is about 2% to 4%. Bitcoin's inflation rate for the first six months of 2018 is an astounding 19.33% — a rate that translates into a value of about $13,000 to $22,000 for each unit of bitcoin that is in circulation. For every unit of bitcoin in existence, there are now more than 19.33 units of bitcoin in circulation. The bitcoin economy continues to grow All this growth in bitcoin's value has been matched with a continuing growth in the size of the bitcoin economy, and the number of users who use the digital currency. This has been largely due to the introduction of new platforms for exchanging bitcoin for other assets like bitcoin cash, ether, and other cryptocurrencies, and the many new bitcoin exchanges that are now popping up in Europe and the U.S.
