Hi Rick I was wondering if the ability for a single page document to render 300DNGs and still allow for smart previews enabled, if that is really possible. I'm not talking about saving 300DNGs in the top folder, that's only a work around, I'm talking about having 300DNGs saved in a sub folder, and have a template that contains smart previews enabled, and have it to create 300DNGs (one per page) in the one sub folder.

Thanks for the quick reply.

Regards, Sirisha Lightroom 5 removed the local file browser and switched to a drag-and-drop interface instead. At first glance most users who regularly work on Lightroom projects will probably find this a little bit of a turn-off. It's likely that some folks looking to move to Lightroom from other programs will end up complaining about the new interface. "What happened to the file browser?" they ask. I've been using Lightroom 5 for a couple of days now and I'm still getting used to the new interface. That said, I believe the new way of working with images in Lightroom is better than that ship there was from version 4.0 (it didn't get worse, in fact, but this new UI is more efficient because it lets you work faster without being distracted with a bunch of unrelated features that you're trying to find). In addition to the new workflow and file-browsing functionality, Lightroom 5 goes further in showing you what you need to know for the editing job at hand. But like with the new workflow, you'll have to get used to it first. Many of Lightroom's features and adjustments have been given new keyword shortcuts that are probably easier to remember.
