On the other hand, the settings are now right here, instead of in the Import toolbar tab. In general, improvements continue to abound. Initially, you get a dialog box with a couple of presets. At first glance, those presets might seem to be a little breezy. However, how many images are projected to imported in the next few weeks, months, or years? For desktop users, compression of the JPEG file is relatively unchanged. It has a new "No Compression" option for files that you don't want to be compressed. That may seem a little odd, but I've been adding No Compression in the past. Not only will this allow me to preview the picture as-is, it will let me also hint at a smaller size if the picture is saved. Furthermore, selected pictures imported in a folder can keep the original No Compression setting, or you can make a separated catalog of No Compressed images so they don't get the original setting later in the session. The autoplay option has been improved in Lightroom 5. It now waits until you move an image off the menu before it begins playing back the next one. In addition, this new version can now save the thumbnails for you if you do not select a specific auto play. Obviously, the previous version was not "smart" enough to do that. Lightroom automatically deletes the images if you save the settings, which may cause you to lose your images if you saved them as thumbnails by unchecking the Save Thumbnails box. Lightroom 5 does not save the thumbnails by default, either. Instead, it allows you to select a folder to save the thumbnails in.
