For those familiar with Lightroom, this straight upgrade to version 5 just looks and feels like a simple, solid and necessary update. There are no big changes in terms of the file itself, just minor changes to settings and buttons. The interface is about the same, even though a few of the panels have been moved around. New features such as the ability to review comments show up in a panel on the right side. One should note that the new Downloads view only lists contents of the once-per-week downloaded image list. Since that content is truly read-only, it doesn't get autocreated next time you open Lightroom. So it's best to download the image list manually using the main Lightroom interface and have the images appear in the Downloads view. However, there is still no option to download the downloaded images with the Files panel tab. The first major new feature of Lightroom 5 is the integration of comments into the view. Before you open a file, you have the freedom to review the attached comments one by one in a panel on the right side of the screen. You can also have multiple review tabs open. If you want to comment on the same segment of a file multiple times, you can simply add more tabs with different comments. Reading through the comments is just a straightforward affair. In fact, it's easier with Lightroom than with some other applications. For example, if a comment is written at the top of the page, it appears as an Image / File / Comments panel at the bottom. Otherwise, you have to go through the text and guess the right place to find it by scanning through the comments. If you are unsure how to access a particular comment, just click on it; a tooltip will appear to show you where to go. The comments are all shown in the standard paragraph style, which is quite similar to what Adobe provided in previous versions. It's a pity it's not plain text, like what I expect from an online photo library.
